Vitamin C and You

Ascorbic Acid, or what is more commonly known as vitamin C, is literally one of the most important vitamins that you can put in your body. Some sources state that vitamin C is involved in and required for up to 300 metabolic functions throughout the body. Known for its properties as an antioxidant, vitamin C is also vital to the formation, development and maintenance of collagen and elastin. Collagen and elastin are found throughout the body and collectively comprise our connective tissues. As you can see, vitamin C is a vital nutrient needed for healthy ligaments, tendons, veins and arteries. Vitamin C is known for its role in promoting healthy teeth and gums, aids in the absorption of iron and is well known for its support of healthy immune function.*

Unlike most other species, humans cannot produce vitamin C, so we need to get it from our diet. As a water-soluble nutrient, it must be replenished on a regular basis to avoid deficiency. Vitamin C is readily found in a variety of foods ranging from select berries and citrus fruits, to various green vegetables, potatoes and a host of herbs.

While it is somewhat easy to get your recommended daily intake of vitamin C through a well balanced diet, the demands of everyday life often makes it difficult to allow for a healthy and nutritious diet to be a consistent reality. In addition to diet, age and lifestyle, environmental factors such as pollution also play a decisive role in nutrient levels within the body. Your activity level, smoking habits, amount of stress you're under, and sleeping habits all factor in and work toward depleting nutrient levels within the body; especially nutrients like vitamin C that need to be regularly replenished.

It is for reasons such as these that supplementation is a welcomed option. In addition to a proper well-balanced diet, supplementing with essential nutrients, like Euro-C® from Roex®, becomes a great resource for all of us to take advantage of to ensure that we are giving our body what it needs.*
